Shock And Disbelief As Reactions To Disclosures Of Child Sexual Abuse

Synopsis

This article describes the reactions of family members and friends when they learn that individuals they know and sometimes love have been accused of child sexual abuse. Shock and disbelief are typical reactions. Some people eventually accept the evidence that respected persons sexually abused children, but some do not and behave in punitive ways toward children. Some abusers get away with it for decades because of refusals to believe children. Disbelief must be replaced with actions to stop perpetrators and to believe children.
